

To allow multiple graphic images of fictionalized violence (including shootings, stabbings, beatings, and other images of violence) every day on public television, while prohibiting (a) displays of natural human anatomy, and (b) images of the consequences of actual violence, indicates hypocritical and unconstitutionally puritanical priorities. Glorifying fantasy violence warps our sensibilities. Images of real violence and suffering disgusts us, as it should. Stop the prime-time glorification of the power of the gun, unless you're willing to show footage of what a gunshot really does.
